Amplification of genetic material is a common feature of many human solid cancers and has been reported as a prognostic factor for a wide variety of solid tumors. It has been described as a result of either a doubling of the number of copies of a gene or an increase in copy number of the same number of gene. Most of the amplification events are either chromosomal or locus specific. Several potential mechanisms could explain this phenomenon. Therefore, the frequent genomic amplification of hepatitis B virus (HBV) in liver cancers suggests that HBV plays an active role in this
